SUGGESTS TIME TABLE FOR CONGRESS

The end of an average session of the United States, Congress finds the members working like so many dilatory students around final examination time. They do a lot of cramming to cover work that should have been done months before. And while they may get finished, their efforts at best are often ill-considered.

For example, the last-minute haste of the 80th Congress may have helped to defeat the Republicans in this month's elections. In voting an 11th-hour appropriation for the Commodity Credit Corporation, the GOP-controlled Congress failed to vote the CCC funds for additional shortage of farm products.

The farmers meanwhile had harvested bumper crops of grain. But this surplus harvest had to be stored in government-approved space in order to make it eligible for support prices. Congress didn't supply the space. The farmers stood to lose money, and the Democrats capitalized on this fact. That may be the big reason why GOP lost that "safe" rural vote in Ohio, Illinois and Iowa. Without those states 63 electoral votes Mr. Truman would not have had the required number to give him an undisputed victory.

Sen. Francis J. Myers of Pennsylvania, being a Democrat, probably is happy about the above incident. But he also knows that the embarrassing results of hasty legislation can work both ways. And he realizes that haste can be bad for the whole country. So, in the interest of safety and efficiency, he has proposed a mild remedy.

He would put major legislation on a timetable basis. The majority leaders of both houses, the the committee chairmen and ranking minority members of committees would meet early in each session and schedule legislation. This schedule would be reviewed each 30 days and, if necessary, revised. There would be "goal" dates for commit-tee hearings, for full consideration of bills and for a vote on them.

The Myers proposal would include all appropriation bills as well as other legislation. And it would strive to eliminate the evil of attaching irrevelent legislative riders to appropriations in the final rush.

Since, ideally, this plan would bring about some much-needed reforms, we would like to feel more encouraged about it than we do. But it will have to buck the oppo-
